Burke's rhetorical pentad—the elements of act, scene, agent, agency, and purpose—is perhaps one of the most familiar concepts to arise from 20th-Century Rhetoric. If we venture a little deeper into this method, we realize the importance he places upon symbolic use of language (in this case, dramatism, or giving a name to the sets of relationships that inform all symbolic action (45)).

From the destruction of an empire and the rise of warlords to foreign invasion and communist revolution, it is clear that China faced immense change in the 20th century. When looking at these developments, especially the rise of the People's Republic in 1949, it may appear as if the underlying motives and values animating Chinese politics had departed greatly from the imperial age.
